Ah me! O King Jupiter, of what a terrible length the nights are! Will it never be day? And yet long since I heard the cock. 5 My domestics are snoring; but they would not have done so heretofore! May you perish then, O war! For many reasons; because I may not even punish my domestics. Neither does this excellent youth awake through the night; but takes his ease, 10 wrapped up in five blankets. Well, if it is the fashion, let us snore wrapped up. 12 But I am not able, miserable man, to sleep, being tormented by my expenses, and my stud of horses, and my debts, through this son of mine. He with his long hair, 15 is riding horses and driving curricles, and dreaming of horses; while I am driven to distraction, as I see the moon bringing on the twentieths; for the interest is running on. Boy! Light a lamp, and bring forth my tablets, that I may take them and read 20 to how many I am indebted, and calculate the interest. Enter boy with a light and tablets. Come, let me see; what do I owe? Twelve minae to Pasias. Why twelve minae to Pasias? Why did I borrow them? When I bought the blood-horse. Ah me, unhappy! Would that it had had its eye knocked out with a stone first! 25 You are acting unfairly, Philo! Drive on your own course. 26 This is the bane that has destroyed me; for even in his sleep he dreams about horsemanship. 28 How many courses will the war-chariots run? 29 Many courses do you drive me, your father. But what debt came upon me after Pasias? Three minae to Amynias for a little chariot and pair of wheels. 32 Lead the horse home, after having

	25 Φίλων ἀδικεῖς· ἔλαυνε τὸν σαυτοῦ δρόμον. 26 τοῦτ’ ἔστι τουτὶ τὸ κακὸν ὅ μ’ ἀπολώλεκεν· 27 ὀνειροπολεῖ γὰρ καὶ καθεύδων ἱππικήν. 28 πόσους δρόμους ἐλᾷ τὰ πολεμιστήρια; 29 ἐμὲ μὲν σὺ πολλοὺς τὸν πατέρ’ ἐλαύνεις δρόμους.	given him a good rolling. 33 O foolish youth, you have rolled me out of my possessions; since I have been cast in suits, and others say that they will have surety given them for the interest. 35b Pray, father, why are you peevish, and toss about the whole night? 37 A bailiff out of the bedclothes is biting me. 38 Suffer me, good sir, to sleep a little. 39 Then, do you sleep on; but know that all these debts will turn on your head. Phidippides falls asleep again. Alas! Would that the match-maker had perished miserably, who induced me to marry your mother. For a country life used to be most agreeable to me, dirty, untrimmed, reclining at random, 45 abounding in bees, and sheep, and oil-cake. Then I, a rustic, married a niece of Megacles, the son of Megacles, from the city, haughty, luxurious, and Coesyrafied. When I married her, I lay with her 50 redolent of new wine, of the cheese-crate, and abundance of wool; but she, on the contrary, of ointment, saffron, wanton-kisses, extravagance, gluttony, and of Colias and Genetyllis. I will not indeed say that she was idle; but she wove. And I used to show her this cloak 55 by way of a pretext and say Wife, you weave at a great rate. 56 We have no oil in the lamp. 57 Ah me! Why did you light the thirsty lamp? Come hither that you may weep! 58b For what, pray, shall I weep? 59 Because you put in one of the thick wicks. 60 After this, when this son was born to us, to me, forsooth, and to my excellent wife, we squabbled then about the name: for she was for adding hippos to the name, Xanthippus, or Charippus, or Callipides; 65 but I was for giving him the name of his grandfather, Phidonides. For a time therefore we disputed; and then at length we agreed, and called him Phidippides. She used to take this son and fondle him, saying, When you, being grown up, shall drive your chariot to the city, 70 like Megacles, with a xystis. But I used to say, Nay, rather, when dressed in a leathern jerkin, you shall drive goats from Phelleus, like your father. He paid no attention to my words, but poured a horse-fever over my property. 75 Now, therefore, by meditating the whole night, I have discovered one path for my course extraordinarily excellent; to which if I persuade this youth I shall be saved. But first I wish to awake him. How then can I awake him in the most agreeable manner? How? 80 Phidippides, my little Phidippides? 80b What, father?

What’s the matter? 82b Tell me, do you love me? 83 Yes, by this Equestrian Neptune. 84 Nay, do not by any means mention this Equestrian to me, for this god is the author of my misfortunes. But, if you really love me from your heart, my son, obey me. 87b In what then, pray, shall I obey you? 88 Reform your habits as quickly as possible, and go and learn what I advise. 90 Tell me now, what do you prescribe? 90b And will you obey me at all? 90c By Bacchus, I will obey you. 91b Look this way then! Do you see this little door and little house? 93 I see it. What then, pray, is this, father? 94 This is a thinking-shop of wise spirits. 95 There dwell men who in speaking of the heavens persuade people that it is an oven, and that it encompasses us, and that we are the embers. These men teach, if one give them money, to conquer in speaking, right or wrong. 100 Who are they? 100b I do not know the name accurately. They are minute philosophers, noble and excellent. 103 Bah! They are rogues; I know them. You mean the quacks, the pale-faced wretches, the bare-footed fellows, of whose numbers are the miserable Socrates and Chaerephon. 105 Hold! Hold! Be silent! Do not say anything foolish. But, if you have any concern for your father’s patrimony, become one of them, having given up your horsemanship. 108 I would not, by Bacchus, even if you were to give me the pheasants which Leogoras rears! 110 Go, I entreat you, dearest of men, go and be taught. 111b Why, what shall I learn? 112 They say that among them are both the two causes —the better cause, whichever that is, and the worse: they say that the one of these two causes, the worse, prevails, 115 though it speaks on the unjust side. If, therefore you learn for me this unjust cause, I would not pay any one, not even an obolus of these debts, which I owe at present on your account. 119 I can not comply; for I should not dare to look upon the knights, having lost all my colour. 121 Then, by Ceres, you shall not eat any of my good! Neither you, nor your blood-horse; but I will drive you out of my house to the crows. 124 My uncle Megacles will not permit me to be without a horse. But I'll go in, and pay no heed to you. 126 Though fallen, still I will not lie prostrate: but having prayed to the gods, I will go myself to the thinking-shop and get taught. How, then, being an old man, 130 shall I learn the subtleties of refined disquisitions? I must go. Why thus do I loiter and not knock at the door? Knocks at the door. Boy! Little boy! 133 Go to the devil! Who it is that knocked at the door? 134 Strepsiades, the son of Phidon, of Cicynna.

But tell me the thing which has been made to miscarry. 140 It is not lawful to mention it, except to disciples. 141 Tell it, then, to me without fear; for I here am come as a disciple to the thinking-shop. 143 I will tell you; but you must regard these as mysteries. Socrates lately asked Chaerephon about a flea, how many of its own feet it jumped; for after having bit the eyebrow of Chaerephon, it leaped away onto the head of Socrates. 148 How then did he measure this? 148b Most cleverly. He melted some wax; and then took the flea 150 and dipped its feet in the wax; and then a pair of Persian slippers stuck to it when cooled. Having gently loosened these, he measured back the distance. 153 O King Jupiter! What subtlety of thought! 154 What then would you say if you heard another contrivance of Socrates? 155b Of what kind? Tell me, I beseech you! 156 Chaerephon the Sphettian asked him whether he thought gnats buzzed through the mouth or the breech. 159 What, then, did he say about the gnat? 160 He said the intestine of the gnat was narrow and that the wind went forcibly through it, being slender, straight to the breech; and then that the rump, being hollow where it is adjacent to the narrow part, resounded through the violence of the wind. 165 The rump of the gnats then is a trumpet! Oh, thrice happy he for his sharp-sightedness! Surely a defendant might easily get acquitted who understands the intestine of the gnat. 169 But he was lately deprived

Tell me. 171 As he was investigating the courses of the moon and her revolutions, then as he was gaping upward a lizard in the darkness dropped upon him from the roof. 174 I am amused at a lizard’s having dropped on Socrates. 175 Yesterday evening there was no supper for us. 176 Well. What then did he contrive for provisions? 177 He sprinkled fine ashes on the table, and bent a little spit, and then took it as a pair of compasses and filched a cloak from the Palaestra. 180 Why then do we admire Thales? Open open quickly the thinking-shop, and show to me Socrates as quickly as possible. For I desire to be a disciple. Come, open the door. The door of the thinking-shop opens and the pupils of Socrates are seen all with their heads fixed on the ground, while Socrates himself is seen suspended in the air in a basket. O Hercules, from what country are these wild beasts? 185 What do you wonder at? To what do they seem to you to be like? 186 To the Spartans who were taken at Pylos. But why in the world do these look upon the ground? 188 They are in search of the things below the earth. 188b Then they are searching for roots. Do not, then, trouble yourselves about this; 190 for I know where there are large and fine ones. Why, what are these doing, who are bent down so much? 192 These are groping about in darkness under Tartarus. 193 Why then does their rump look toward heaven?
1.139	139 ἀλλ’ εἰπέ μοι τὸ πρᾶγμα τοὐξημβλωμένον. 140 ἀλλ’ οὐ θέμις πλὴν τοῖς μαθηταῖσιν λέγειν. 141 λέγε νυν ἐμοὶ θαρρῶν· ἐγὼ γὰρ οὑτοσὶ 142 ἥκω μαθητὴς ἐς τὸ φροντιστήριον. 143 λέξω. νομίσαι δὲ ταῦτα χρὴ μυστήρια. 144 ἀνήρετ’ ἄρτι Χαιρεφῶντα Σωκράτης 145 ψύλλαν ὁπόσους ἅλλοιτο τοὺς αὑτῆς πόδας· 146 δακοῦσα γὰρ τοῦ Χαιρεφῶντος τὴν ὀφρῦν 147 ἐπὶ τὴν κεφαλὴν τὴν Σωκράτους ἀφήλατο.

I don’t believe you; for I do not see the Dicasts sitting. 209 Be assured that this is truly the Attic territory. 210 Why, where are my fellow-tribesmen of Cicynna? 211 Here they are. And Euboea here, as you see, is stretched out a long way by the side of it to a great distance. 213 I know that; for it was stretched by us and Pericles. But where is Lacedaemon? 214b Where is it? Here it is. 215 How near it is to us! Pay great attention to this, to remove it very far from us. 217 By Jupiter, it is not possible. 217b Then you will weep for it. Looking up and discovering Socrates. Come, who is this man who is in the basket? 219 Himself. 219b Who’s Himself? 219c Socrates. 219d O Socrates! Come, you sir, call upon him loudly for me. 220a Nay, rather, call him yourself; for I have no leisure. 221 Socrates! My little Socrates! 223 Why callest thou me, thou creature of a day? 224 First tell me, I beseech you, what are you doing.

But if, being on the ground, I speculated from below on things above, I should never have discovered them. For the earth forcibly attracts to itself the meditative moisture. Water-cresses also suffer the very same thing. 235 What do you say? Does meditation attract the moisture to the water-cresses? Come then, my little Socrates, descend to me, that you may teach me those things, for the sake of which I have come. 239 And for what did you come? 239b Wishing to learn to speak; for by reason of usury, and most ill-natured creditors, I am pillaged and plundered, and have my goods seized for debt. 242 How did you get in debt without observing it? 243 A horse-disease consumed me--terrible at eating. But teach me the other one of your two causes, that which pays nothing; and I will swear by the gods, I will pay down to you whatever reward you exact of me. 247 By what gods will you swear? For, in the first place,

By iron money, as in Byzantium? 250 Do you wish to know clearly celestial matters, what they rightly are? 251b Yes, by Jupiter, if it be possible! 252 And to hold converse with the Clouds, our divinities? 253b By all means. 254 Seat yourself, then, upon the sacred couch. 255 Well, I am seated! 255b Take, then, this chaplet. 256b For what purpose a chaplet? Ah me! Socrates, see that you do not sacrifice me like Athamas! 258 No; we do all these to those who get initiated. 259b Then what shall I gain, pray? 260 You shall become in oratory a tricky knave, a thorough rattle, a subtle speaker. But keep quiet.

O sovereign King, immeasurable Air, who keepest the earth suspended, and through bright Aether, and ye august goddesses, the Clouds, sending thunder and lightning, arise, appear in the air, O mistresses, to your deep thinker! 267 Not yet, not yet, till I wrap this around me lest I be wet through. To think of my having come from home without even a cap, unlucky man! 269 Come then, ye highly honoured Clouds, for a display to this man. 270 Whether ye are sitting upon the sacred snow-covered summits of Olympus, or in the gardens of Father Ocean form a sacred dance with the Nymphs, or draw in golden pitchers the streams of the waters of the Nile, or inhabit the Maeotic lake, or the snowy rock of Mimas, hearken to our prayer, and receive the sacrifice, and be propitious to the sacred rites.

Are they some heroines? 316 By no means; but heavenly Clouds, great divinities to idle men; who supply us with thought and argument, and intelligence and humbug, and circumlocution, and ability to hoax, and comprehension. 319 On this account therefore my soul, having heard their voice, flutters, and already seeks to discourse subtilely, and to quibble about smoke, and having pricked a maxim with a little notion, to refute the opposite argument. So that now I eagerly desire, if by any means it be possible, to see them palpably. 323 Look, then, hither, toward Mount Parnes; for now I behold them descending gently. 324b Pray where? Show me. 324c See! There they come in great numbers through the hollows and thickets; there, obliquely. 325b What’s the matter? For I can’t see them. 326b By the entrance. 326c Now at length with difficulty I just see them. 327 Now at length you assuredly see them, unless you have your eyes running pumpkins. 328 Yes, by Jupiter! O highly honoured Clouds, πάντα γὰρ ἤδη κατέχουσιν. 329 ταύτας μέντοι σὺ θεὰς οὔσας οὐκ ἤδησθ’ οὐδ’ ἐνόμιζες; 330 μὰ Δί’ ἀλλ’ ὁμίχλην καὶ δρόσον αὐτὰς ἡγούμην καὶ καπνὸν εἶναι. 331 οὐ γὰρ μὰ Δί’ οἶσθ’ ὁτιὴ πλείστους αὗται βόσκουσι σοφιστάς, 332 Θουριομάντεις ἰατροτέχνας σφραγιδονυχαργοκομήτας, 333 κυκλίων τε χορῶν ἁσματοκάμπτας ἄνδρας μετεωροφένακας, 334 οὐδὲν δρῶντας βόσκουσ’ ἀργούς, ὅτι ταύτας μουσοποιοῦσιν. 335 ταῦτ’ ἄρ’ ἐποίουν ὑγρᾶν Νεφελᾶν στρεπταιγλᾶν δάιον ὁρμάν, 336 πλοκάμους θ’ ἑκατογκεφάλα Τυφῶ πρημαινούσας τε θυέλλας, 337 εἶτ’ ἀερίας διεράς, γαμψοὺς οἰωνοὺς ἀερονηχεῖς, 338 ὄμβρους θ’ ὑδάτων δροσερᾶν Νεφελᾶν· εἶτ’ ἀντ’ αὐτῶν κατέπινον	for now they cover all things. 329 Did you not, however, know, nor yet consider, these to be goddesses? 330 No, by Jupiter! But I thought them to be mist, and dew, and smoke. 331 For you do not know, by Jupiter! that these feed very many sophists, Thurian soothsayers, practisers of medicine, lazy-long-haired-onyx-ring-wearers, song-twisters for the cyclic dances, and meteorological quacks. They feed idle people who do nothing, because such men celebrate them in verse. 335 For this reason, then, they introduced into their verses the dreadful impetuosity of the moist, whirling-bright clouds; and the curls of hundred-headed Typho; and the hard-blowing tempests; and then aerial, moist; crooked-clawed birds, floating in air and the showers of rain from dewy Clouds. And then, in return for these, they swallow slices of great, fine mullets, and bird’s-flesh of thrushes. 340 Is it not just, however, that they should have their reward, on account of these? 340b Tell me, pray, if they are really clouds, what ails them, that they resemble mortal women? For they are not such. 342b Pray, of what nature are they? 343 I do not clearly know: at any rate they resemble spread-out fleeces, and not women, by Jupiter! Not a bit; for these have noses. 345 Answer, then, whatever I ask you. 345b Then say quickly what you wish. 346 Have you ever, when you; looked up, seen a cloud like to a centaur, or a panther, or a wolf, or a bull? 347b By Jupiter, have I! But what of that? 348 They become all things, whatever they please. And then if they see a person with long hair, a wild one of these hairy fellows, like the son of Xenophantes, in derision of his folly, they liken themselves to centaurs. 351 Why, what, if they should see Simon, a plunderer of the public property, what do they do? 352 They suddenly become wolves, showing up his disposition. 353 For this reason, then, for this reason, when they yesterday saw Cleonymus the recreant, on this account they became stags, because they saw this most cowardly fellow. 355 And now too, because they saw Clisthenes, you observe, on this account they became women.

And now, if ever ye did to any other, to me also utter a voice reaching to heaven, O all-powerful queens. 358 Hail, O ancient veteran, hunter after learned speeches! And thou, O priest of most subtle trifles! Tell us what you require? 360 For we would not hearken to any other of the recent meteorological sophists, except to Prodicus; to him, on account of his wisdom and intelligence; and to you, because you walk proudly in the streets, and cast your eyes askance, and endure many hardships with bare feet, and in reliance upon us lookest supercilious. 364 O Earth, what a voice! How holy and dignified and wondrous! 365 For, in fact, these alone are goddesses; and all the rest is nonsense. 366 But come, by the Earth, is not Jupiter, the Olympian, a god? 367 What Jupiter? Do not trifle. There is no Jupiter. 367b What do you say? Who rains then? For first of all explain this to me. 369 These to be sure. I will teach you it by powerful evidence. Come, where have you ever seen him raining at any time without Clouds? And yet he ought to rain in fine weather, and these be absent. 372 By Apollo, of a truth you have rightly confirmed this by your present argument. And yet, before this, I really thought that Jupiter caused the rain. But tell me who is it that thunders. This makes me tremble. 375 These, as they roll, thunder. 375b In what way? you all-daring man! 376 When they are full of much water, and are compelled to be borne along, being necessarily precipitated when full of rain, then they fall heavily upon each other and burst and clap. 379 Who is it that compels them to borne along? Is it not Jupiter? 380 By no means, but aethereal Vortex. 380b Vortex? It had escaped my notice that Jupiter did not exist, and that Vortex now reigned in his stead. But you have taught me nothing as yet concerning the clap and the thunder. 383 Have you not heard me, that I said that the Clouds, when full of moisture, dash against each other and clap by reason of their density? 385 Come, how am I to believe this? 385b I’ll teach you from your own case. Were you ever, after being stuffed with broth at the Panathenaic festival, then disturbed in your belly, and did a tumult suddenly rumble through it? 388 Yes, by Apollo! And immediately the little broth plays the mischief with me, and is disturbed and rumbles like thunder, and grumbles dreadfully: 390 at first gently pappax, pappax; and then it adds papa-pappax; and finally, it thunders downright papapappax, as they do. 392 Consider, therefore, how you have trumpeted from a little belly so small; and how is it not probable that this air, being boundless, should thunder so loudly? 394 For this reason, therefore, the two names also Trump and Thunder, are similar to each other. But teach me this, whence comes the thunderbolt blazing with fire, and burns us to ashes when it smites us, and singes those who survive. For indeed Jupiter evidently hurls this at the perjured. 398 Why, how then, you foolish person, and savouring of the dark ages and antediluvian, if his manner is to smite the perjured, does he not blast Simon, 400 and Cleonymus, and Theorus? And yet they are very perjured. But he smites his own temple, and Sunium the promontory of Athens, and the tall oaks. Wherefore, for indeed an oak does not commit perjury. 403 I do not know; but you seem to speak well. For what, pray, is the thunderbolt? 404 When a dry wind, having been raised aloft, is inclosed in these Clouds, it inflates them within, like a bladder; and then, of necessity, having burst them, it rushes out with vehemence by reason of its density, setting fire to itself through its rushing and impetuosity. 408 By Jupiter, of a truth I once experienced this exactly at the Diasian festival! I was roasting a haggis for my kinsfolk, and through neglect I did not cut it open; but it became inflated and then suddenly bursting, befouled my eyes and burned my face. 412 O mortal, who hast desired great wisdom from us! How happy will you become among the Athenians and among the Greeks, if you be possessed of a good memory, and be a deep thinker, and endurance of labour be implanted 415 in your soul, and you be not wearied either by standing or walking, nor be exceedingly vexed at shivering with cold, nor long to break your fast, and you refrain from wine, and gymnastics, and the other follies, and consider this the highest excellence, as is proper a clever man should, to conquer by action and counsel, and by battling with your tongue. 420 As far as regards a sturdy spirit, and care that makes one’s bed uneasy, and a frugal spirit and hard-living and savory-eating belly, be of good courage and don’t trouble yourself; I would offer myself to hammer on, for that matter. 423 Will you not, pray, now believe in no god, except what we believe in--this Chaos, and the Clouds, and the Tongue--these three? 425 Absolutely I would not even converse with the others, not even if I met them; nor would I sacrifice to them, nor make libations, nor offer frankincense. 427 Tell us then boldly, what we must do for you? For you shall not fail in getting it, if you honour and admire us, and seek to become clever. 429 O mistresses, I request of you then this very small favour, that I be the best of the Greeks in speaking by a hundred stadia. 431 Well, you shall have this from us, so that hence-forward from this time no one shall get more opinions passed in the public assemblies than you. 433 Grant me not to deliver important opinions; for I do not desire these, but only to pervert the right for my own advantage, and to evade my creditors. 435 Then you shall obtain what you desire; for you do not covet great things. But commit yourself without fear to our ministers. 437 I will do so in reliance upon you, for necessity oppresses me, on account of the blood-horses, and the marriage that ruined me. Now, therefore, let them use me as they please. 440 I give up this body to them to be beaten, to be hungered, to be troubled with thirst, to be squalid, to shiver with cold, to flay into a leathern bottle, 445 if I shall escape clear from my debts, and appear to men to be bold, glib of tongue, audacious, impudent, shameless, a fabricator of falsehoods, inventive of words, a practiced knave in lawsuits, a law-tablet, a thorough rattle, a fox, a sharper, a slippery knave, a dissembler, a slippery fellow, an impostor, 450 a gallows-bird, a blackguard, a twister, a troublesome fellow, a licker-up of hashes. If they call me this, when they meet me, let them do to me absolutely what they please. And if they like, 455 by Ceres, let them serve up a sausage out of me to the deep thinkers.

In the first place, not less than a drachma every month for torches; so that also all, when they went out of an evening, were wont to say, Boy, don’t buy a torch, for the moonlight is beautiful. 615 And she says she confers other benefits on you, but that you do not observe the days at all correctly, but confuse them up and down; so that she says the gods are constantly threatening her, when they are defrauded of their dinner, and depart home, not having met with the regular feast according to the number of the days. 620 And then, when you ought to be sacrificing, you

And often, while we gods are observing a fast, when we mourn for Memnon or Sarpedon, you are pouring libations and laughing. For which reason Hyperbolus, having obtained the lot this year to be Hieromnemon, was afterward deprived by us gods 625 of his crown; for thus he will know better that he ought to spend the days of his life according to the Moon.

Attatai! 708 What ails you? Why are you distressed? 709 Wretched man, I am perishing! The Corinthians, coming out from the bed, are biting me, and devouring my sides, and drinking up my life-blood, and tearing away my flesh, and digging through my vitals, and will annihilate me. 716 Do not now be very grievously distressed. 717 Why, how, when my money is gone, my complexion gone, my life gone, and my slipper gone? 720 And furthermore in addition to these evils, with singing the night-watches, I am almost gone myself. 723 Ho you! What are you about? Are you not meditating? 723b I? Yea, by Neptune! 724b And what, pray, have you thought? 725 Whether any bit of me will be left by the bugs. 726 You will perish most wretchedly. 726b But, my good friend, I have already perished. 727 You must not give in, but must wrap yourself up; for you have to discover a device for abstracting, and a means of cheating. 729b Ah me! Would, pray, some one would throw over me a swindling contrivance from the sheep-skins. 731 Come now; I will first see this fellow, what he is about. Ho you! Are you asleep? 732b No, by Apollo, I am not! 733 Have you got

For do you tell me this, O Socrates! 737 Do you, yourself, first find out and state what you wish. 738 You have heard a thousand times what I wish. About the interest; so that I may pay no one. 740 Come then, wrap yourself up, and having given your mind play with subtilty, revolve your affairs by little and little, rightly distinguishing and examining. 742b Ah me, unhappy man! 743 Keep quiet; and if you be puzzled in any one of your conceptions, leave it and go; and then set your mind in motion again, and lock it up. 746 (in great glee). O dearest little Socrates! 746b What, old man? 747 I have got a device for cheating them of the interest.

If the moon were to rise no longer anywhere, I should not pay the interest. 755b Why so, pray? 756 Because the money is lent out by the month. 757 Capital! But I will again propose to you another clever question. If a suit of five talents should be entered against you, tell me how you would obliterate it. 761 How? How? I do not know but I must seek. 762 Do not then always revolve your thoughts about yourself; but slack away your mind into the air, like a cock-chafer tied with a thread by the foot. 765 I have found a very clever method of getting rid of my suit, so that you yourself would acknowledge it. 766b Of what description? 767 Have you ever seen this stone in the chemist’s shops, the beautiful and transparent one, from which they kindle fire? 769b Do you mean the burning-glass? 770 I do. If, while one suit was still pending, before mine was called on, I were to run away and hang myself. 781 You talk nonsense. 781b By the gods, would I! But go and gnaw the columns of Megacles. 816 My good sir, what is the matter with you, O father? You are not in your senses, by Olympian Jupiter! 818 See, see, Olympian Jupiter! What folly! To think of your believing in Jupiter, as old as you are! 820 Why, pray, did you laugh at this? 820b Reflecting that you are a child, and have antiquated notions. Yet, however, approach, that you may know more; and I will tell you a thing, by learning which you will be a man. But see that you do not teach this to any one. 825 Well, what is it? 825b You swore now by Jupiter. 826 I did. 826b Seest thou, then, how good a thing is learning? There is no Jupiter, O Phidippides! 827b Who then? 828 Vortex reigns, having expelled Jupiter. 829 Bah! Why do you talk foolishly? 829b Be assured that it is so. 830 Who says this? 830b Socrates the Melian, and Chaerephon, who knows the footmarks of fleas. 832 Have you arrived at such a pitch of frenzy that you believe madmen? 833b Speak words of good omen, and say nothing bad of clever men 835 and wise; of whom, through frugality, none ever shaved or anointed himself, or went to a bath to wash himself; while you squander my property in bathing, as if I were already dead. But go as quickly as possible and learn instead of me. 840 What good could any one learn from them? 841 What, really?

And you will know yourself, how ignorant and stupid you are. But wait for me here a short time. 844 Ah me! What shall I do, my father being crazed? Shall I bring him into court and convict him of lunacy, or shall I give information of his madness to the coffin-makers? 847 Come, let me see; what do you consider this to be? Tell me. 848 Alectryon. 848b Right. And what this? 849 Alectryon. 849b Both the same? You are very ridiculous. Do not do so, then, for the future; but call this ἀλεκτρύαινα, and this one ἀλέκτωρ. 852 Ἀλεκτρύαινα! Did you learn these clever things by going in just now to the Titans? 854 And many others too; but whatever I learned on each occasion I used to forget immediately, through length of years. 856 Is it for this reason, pray, that you have also lost your cloak? 857 I have not lost it; but have studied it away. 858 What have you made of your slippers, you foolish man? 859 I have expended them, like Pericles, for needful purposes. 860 Come, move, let us go. And then if you obey your father, go wrong if you like. I also know that I formerly obeyed you, a lisping child of six years old, and bought you a go-cart at the Diasia, with the first obolus I received from the Heliaea. 865 You will assuredly some time at length be grieved at this. 866 It is well done of you that you obeyed. Come hither, come hither O Socrates! Come forth, for I bring to you this son of mine, having persuaded him against his will. 868b For he is still childish, and not used to the baskets here. 870 You would yourself be used to them if you were hanged. 871 A mischief take you! Do you abuse your teacher? 872 Were hanged quoth’a! How sillily he pronounced it, and with lips wide apart! How can this youth ever learn an acquittal from a trial 875 or a legal summons, or persuasive refutation? And yet Hyperbolus learned this at the cost of a talent. 877 Never mind; teach him. He is clever by nature. Indeed, from his earliest years, when he was a little fellow only so big, he was wont to form houses and carve ships within-doors, 880 and make little wagons of leather, and make frogs out of pomegranate-rinds, you can’t think how cleverly. But see that he learns those two causes; the better, whatever it may be; and the worse, which, by maintaining what is unjust, overturns the better. 885 If not both, at any rate the unjust one by all means. 886 He shall learn it himself from the two causes in person. 887b I will take my departure. Remember this now, that he is to be able to reply to all just arguments.

In the first place it was incumbent that no one should hear the voice of a boy uttering a syllable; and next, that those from the same quarter of the town should march in good order through the

Then again, their master would teach them, not sitting cross-legged, to learn by rote a song, either Παλλάδα περσέπολιν δεινὰν or τηλέπορόν τι βόαμα raising to a higher pitch the harmony which our fathers transmitted to us. But if any of them were to play the buffoon, or to turn any quavers, 970 like these difficult turns the present artists make after the manner of Phrynis, he used to be thrashed, being beaten with many blows, as banishing the Muses. And it behooved the boys, while sitting in the school of the Gymnastic-master, to cover the thigh, so that they might exhibit nothing indecent to those outside; 975 then again, after rising from the ground, to sweep the sand together, and to take care not to leave an impression of the person for their lovers. And no boy used in those days to anoint himself below the navel; so that their bodies wore the appearance of blooming health. Nor used he to go to his lover, having made up his voice in an effeminate tone, 980 prostituting himself with his eyes. Nor used it to be allowed when one was dining to take the head of the radish, or to snatch from their seniors dill or parsley, or to eat fish, or to giggle, or to keep the legs crossed. 984 Aye, antiquated and dipolia-like and full of grasshoppers, and of Cecydes, and of the Buphonian festival! 985b Yet certainly these are those principles by which my system of education nurtured the men who fought at Marathon. But you teach the men of the present day, so that I am choked, when at the Panathenaia a fellow, holding his shield before his person, neglects Tritogenia, when they ought to dance. 990 Wherefore, O youth, choose with confidence, me, the better cause, and you will learn to hate the Agora, and to refrain from baths, and to be ashamed of what is disgraceful, and to be enraged if any one jeer you, and to rise up from seats before your seniors when they approach, and not to behave ill toward your parents, and to do nothing else 995 that is base, because you are to form in your mind an image of Modesty: and not to dart into the house of a dancing-woman, lest, while gaping after these things, being struck with an apple by a wanton, you should be damaged in your reputation: and not to contradict your father in anything; nor by calling him Iapetus, to reproach him with the ills of age, by which you were reared in your infancy. 1000 If you shall believe him in this, O youth, by Bacchus, you will be like the sons of Hippocrates, and they will call you a booby. 1002 Yet certainly shall you spend your time in the gymnastic schools, sleek and blooming; not chattering in the market-place rude jests, like the youths of the present day; nor dragged into court for a petty suit, greedy, pettifogging, knavish; 1005 but you shall descend to the Academy and run races beneath the sacred olives along with some modest compeer, crowned with white reeds, redolent of yew, and careless ease, of leaf-shedding white poplar, rejoicing in the season of spring, when the plane-tree whispers to the elm.

For immediately I seize and hold you by the waist without escape. Come, tell me, which of the sons of Jupiter do you deem to have been the bravest in soul, and to have undergone most labours? 1050 I consider no man superior to Hercules. 1051 Where, pray, did you ever see cold Herculean baths? And yet, who was more valiant than he? 1052b These are the very things which make the bath full of youths always chattering all day long, but the palaestras empty. 1055 You next find fault with their living in the market-place; but I commend it. For if it had been bad, Homer would never have been for representing Nestor as an orator; nor all the other wise men. I will return, then, from thence to the tongue, which this fellow says our youths ought not to exercise, while I maintain they should. 1060 And again, he says they ought to be modest: two very great evils. For tell me to whom you have ever seen any good accrue through modesty and confute me by your words. 1063 To many. Peleus, at any rate, received his sword on account of it. 1064 A sword? Marry, he got a pretty piece of luck, the poor wretch! While Hyperbolus, he of the lamps, got more than many talents by his villainy, but by Jupiter, no sword! 1067 And Peleus married Thetis, too, through his modesty. 1068 And then she went off and left him; for he was not lustful, nor an agreeable bedfellow to spend the night with. 1070 Now a woman delights in being wantonly treated. But you are an old dotard. For (to Phidippides). consider, O youth, all that attaches to modesty, and of how many pleasures you are about to be deprived—of women, of games at cottabus, of dainties, of drinking-bouts, of giggling. And yet, what is life worth to you if you be deprived of these enjoyments? 1075 Well, I will pass from thence to the necessities of our nature. You have gone astray, you have fallen in love, you have been guilty of some adultery, and then have been caught. You are undone, for you are unable to speak. But if you associate with me, indulge your inclination, dance, laugh, and think nothing disgraceful. For if you should happen to be detected as an adulterer, you will make this reply to him, 1080 that you have done him no injury: and then refer him to Jupiter, how even he is overcome by love and women . And yet, how could you, who are a mortal, have greater power than a god? 1083 But what if he should suffer the radish through obeying you, and be depillated with hot ashes? What argument will he be able to state, to prove that he is not a blackguard? 1085 And if he be a blackguard, what harm will he suffer?

Won’t you march, Mr. Blood-horse? 1299 Is not this an insult, pray? 1299b Will you move quickly? Pricks him behind with the goad. I’ll lay on you, goading you behind, you outrigger? Do you fly? Amynias runs off. I thought I should stir you, together with your wheels and your two-horse chariots.

For why ought your body to be exempt from blows and mine not? And yet I too was born free. 1415 The boys weep, and do you not think it is right that a father should weep? You will say that it is ordained by law that this should be the lot of boys. But I would reply, that old men are boys twice over, and that it is the more reasonable that the old should weep than the young, inasmuch as it is less just that they should err. 1420 It is nowhere ordained by law that a father should suffer this. 1421 Was it not then a man like you and me, who first proposed this law, and by speaking persuaded the ancients? Why then is it less lawful for me also in turn to propose henceforth a new law for the sons, that they should beat their fathers in turn? 1425 But as many blows as we received before the law was made, we remit: and we concede to them our having been thrashed without return. Observe the cocks and these other animals, how they punish their fathers; and yet, in what do they differ from us, except that they do not write decrees? 1430 Why then, since you imitate the cocks in all things, do you not both eat dung and sleep on a perch? 1432 It is not the same thing, my friend; nor would it appear so to Socrates. 1433 Therefore do not beat me; otherwise you will one day blame yourself. 1434 Why, how? 1434b Since I am justly entitled to chastise you; and you to chastise your son, if you should have one. 1435b But if I should not have one, I shall have wept for nothing, and you will die laughing at me. 1437 To me, indeed, O comrades, he seems to speak justly; and I think we ought to concede to them what is fitting. For it is proper that we should weep, if we do not act justly. 1440 Consider still another maxim. 1440b No; for I shall perish if I do. 1441 And yet perhaps you will not be vexed at suffering what you now suffer. 1442 How, pray? For inform me what good you will do me by this. 1443 I will beat my mother, just as I have you. 1443b What do you say? What do you say? This other, again, is a greater wickedness. 1444b But what if, having the worst Cause,

But it is just; for I ought not to have withheld the money which I borrowed. Now, therefore, come with me, my dearest son, 1465 that you may destroy the blackguard Chaerephon and Socrates, who deceived you and me. 1467 I will not injure my teachers. 1468 Yes, yes, reverence Paternal Jove. 1469 Paternal Jove quoth’a! How antiquated you are! Why, is there any Jove? 1470b There is. 1470c There is not, no; for Vortex reigns having expelled Jupiter. 1472 He has not expelled him; but I fancied this, on account of this Vortex here. Ah me, unhappy man! When I even took you who are of earthenware for a god. 1475 Here rave and babble to yourself. 1476 Ah me, what madness! How mad, then, I was when I ejected the gods on account of Socrates! But O dear Hermes, by no means be wroth with me, nor destroy me; but pardon me, 1480 since I have gone crazy through prating. And become my adviser, whether I shall bring an action and prosecute them, or whatever you think. You advise me rightly, not permitting me to get up a lawsuit, but as soon as possible to set fire to the house 1485 of the prating fellows. Come hither, come hither, Xanthias! Come forth with a ladder and with a mattock and then mount upon the thinking-shop and dig down the roof, if you love your master, until you tumble the house upon them. 1490 But let some one bring me a lighted torch and I’ll make some of them this day suffer punishment, even if they be ever so much impostors. 1493 (from within). Hollo! Hollo! 1494 It is your business, O torch, to send forth abundant flame. 1495 What are you doing, fellow? 1495b What am I doing? Why, what else, than chopping logic with the beams of your house? 1497 (from within). Ah me! Who is setting fire to our house? 1498 The man whose cloak you have taken. 1499 (from within). You will destroy us! You will destroy us! 1499b For I also wish this very thing; 1500 unless my mattock deceive my hopes, or I should somehow fall first and break my neck. 1502 (from within). Hollo you! What are you doing, pray, you fellow on the roof? 1503 I am walking on air, and speculating about the sun. 1504 Ah me, unhappy! I shall be suffocated, wretched man! 1505 And I, miserable man, shall be burnt to death! 1506 For what has come into your heads that you acted insolently toward the gods, and pried into the seat of the moon? 1508 Chase, pelt, smite them, for many reasons, but especially because you know that they offended against the gods!
